Our Washington Correspondence.

The Roosevelt administration has become vociferously notorious for the gigantic and unheard-of frauds that have been perpetrated since its advent to power, and also for the slight efforts made to expose them and punish the offenders. A few of the smaller fry in the postoffice scandal have been indicted and few have been tried, but not convicted, as the evidence adduced by the government attorneys was not sufficient to convince a jury of their guilt. The delay in investigating these scandals has been a boon to most of the greater offenders, for that convenient law, the statute of limitations, has run its course and the time had expired in which they could be indicted. That the statute of limitations covers a number of these questions is denied by eminent lawyers, but the Republican Attorney General has decided that it does, and there is no way of bringing the culprits to trial, if the law officer of the government refuses to act. As hitherto mentioned in this correspondence, one of the principal participants in the leniency of this accommodating statute is Representative Littauer, who, President Roosevelt described as "his personal friend and closest political advisor." Littauer was charged with sharing in the profits of a large army glove contract, and that he had used his position as a member of Congress to obtain the contract, notwithstanding the provision of the law that no official should be interested in any such deal. When referred to the Republican Attorney General, he promptly decided that Mr. Littauer could not be prosecuted, as the statute of limitations had run its course, so the "closest political advisor" of the President escaped the humiliation of a trial and possible conviction.
